WebChildren's Code. Clause 26 requires that a 'significant' number of children use a service before it is subject to the Bill's child safety duty, and therefore must protect children from age-inappropriate and harmful content. This is likely to mean that harm is displaced, rather than tackled. Highly problematic services including Telegram WebExplore their motivations - if older children are curious about sex, point them to better sources of information, such as ChildLine or bishuk.com. For younger children, actively manage their access to the internet and reset parental controls across all devices. If you are worried that the content is illegal contact the Internet Watch Foundation. WebAll children -female and male - are by definition more vulnerable than adults, being physically, emotionally and economically dependent on adults for care and protection. NSPCC's 2011 prevalence study² and wider research detailed elsewhere in this response strongly supports a gender based analysis of violence against women and girls. Webis less sexual abuse is one where: the places where children spend time are made safer; adults take action to keep children safe; children know what abuse is and are able to speak out; and there is early and effective action if problems do emerge. We need to address all of these things to make children safer.

1. Creating safer environments Web• Many children and young people have been 'groomed' online by adults often pretending to be other young people with the ultimate aim of exploiting them sexually. This can be via online chat rooms, social networking, email, mobile phones or stalking their online activities. S.14 and 15 of the same Act², facilitating a child sex offence or Webproprietors of sex shops do not allow access to children. Films and computer games are classified in an age appropriate way. The same kinds of processes and policies need to apply to spaces and services that children engage in online.

2.2 We want children to feel free to use online and offline spaces with the same freedoms and protections.
